

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

3 2044 103 234 167

136

33.3

HARVARD
LAW LIBRARY

136
33.3

Ed. Oct. 1930

HARVARD LAW LIBRARY

Received FEB 10 1928

136
33.3

No 20

International Copyright.

23/

MEETING

co
#

, OF

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS,

AT THE

BOOMS OF THE NEW YORK HISTORICAL SOCIETY,

APRIL 9, 1868

AND

ORGANIZATION OF THE

International Copyright Association.

0

NEW YORK :
INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT ASSOCIATION.
661 BROADWAY.
1868.

FEB 10 1928

THE TROW & SMITH
BOOK MANUFACTURING CO.,
46, 48, 50 Greene St., N. Y.

136
—
33.3

P R E F A C E.

THE members of the Committee, at whose call the meeting, of which the following pages are a record, was convened, were impressed with the unusual significance of what was spoken and read on the occasion. It is not probable that so valuable a presentation of the grounds upon which an International Copyright Law is claimed to be the right of authors and publishers everywhere, will ever again be made. They have accordingly requested the Secretary, Mr. Stedman, to prepare his Report of proceedings, in this form, for publication by the International Copyright Association. It is earnestly hoped that the facts and arguments here printed will obtain the attention, not only of journalists and speakers who make public opinion, but of the national representatives at Washington, by whose act alone can the United States be set right upon the question before the world.

GEORGE P. PUTNAM,	} Committee.
S. IRENÆUS PRIME,
HENRY IVISON,
JAMES PARTON,
EGBERT HAZARD.

CONTENTS.

Circular of the Committee.....	5
List of Officers.....	6
Letter of George William Curtis.....	6
" S. D. Gross.....	7
" Prof. Agassiz.....	8
" A. J. Roe.....	8
" John G. Palfrey.....	9
" J. T. Headley.....	9
" William Goodell.....	10
" Dr. Dio Lewis.....	10
" Dr. J. G. Holland.....	10
" James T. Fields.....	10
" J. W. Harper.....	11
" William Gilmore Simms.....	11
" William R. Williams, D. D.....	11
" Henry C. Carey.....	12
" William M. Blackburn.....	12
Speech of William Cullen Bryant.....	13
Report of the Committee.....	18
Speech of S. Irenæus Prime, D. D.....	17
" Dr. Francis Lieber.....	20
" Samuel Osgood, D. D.....	24
" Philip Schaff, D. D.....	26
 APPENDIX:
I. The Right of Copyright, by S. Irenæus Prime.....	29
II. Lord Mansfield's Opinion—Letter from Albert Mathews.....	38
III. Statement of the Question, by Richard Grant White.....	35
IV. Copyright Association—Organization and list of members.....	41

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.

RECORD OF THE MEETING. .

A MEETING of authors, artists, publishers, and others wishing to consider the question of International Copyright, was held on the evening of the 9th of April, 1868, in the Hall of the Historical Society, corner of Eleventh street and Second Avenue, New York.

The assemblage was brought together by issue of the following circular :

JUSTICE TO AUTHORS AND ARTISTS.

NEW YORK, 661 Broadway, {
March 12, 1868. }

It is proposed to hold a second meeting in the city of New York, to consider further the subject of International Copyright, and to concert measures for securing the early establishment of an International Copyright system among all the civilized nations of the earth. This meeting will be held in the Hall of the New York Historical Society, at the corner of Second Avenue and Eleventh street, on Thursday evening, April the 9th, at eight o'clock. You are earnestly invited to attend.

In case you cannot be present, your views on the subject, for or against, and any suggestions you may be pleased to offer, will be welcomed, and duly considered. You are further invited to sign the memorial annexed,* and to procure signatures to it, and return the same to GEORGE P. PUTNAM, at the address named above, before the first of April.

GEO. P. PUTNAM, Chairman , S. IRENÆUS PRIME, HENRY IVISON, JAMES PARTON, Secretary . EGBERT HAZARD.	} Committee appointed at the meeting of February, 1868.

* See Appendix (IV.)

Mr. GEORGE P. PUTNAM called the meeting to order, and nominated as Chairman WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT, who was elected and warmly greeted.

VICE-PRESIDENTS.

Prof. FRANCIS LIEBER, LL. D.,	D. HUNTINGTON, Pres't Nat. Acad. of
Hon. HORACE GREELEY,	Design,
Judge C. P. DALY,	JOHN H. GRISCOM, M. D.,
Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER,	Rev. J. A. SPENCER, D. D.,
HORACE WEBSTER, LL. D.,	CHARLES SCRIBNER,
GEO. P. PUTNAM,	HENRY IVISON.

SECRETARIES.

EDMUND C. STEDMAN,	A. D. F. RANDOLPH.
--------------------	--------------------

Many of these gentlemen were upon the platform. Mr. Bryant having taken the chair,

Mr. PUTNAM reported that his Committee had sent the foregoing Circular to a large number of authors and publishers, and had received many answers to the same, and numerous signatures of persons distinguished in literature or art, and of prominent publishers, to the Memorial drawn up for presentation to Congress in behalf of an International Copyright law. He repeated the names of many of the writers,* and then proceeded to read, in part or in full, the following letters of special interest to those present :

From GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

NORTH SHORE, Staten Island, }
April 7, 1868. }

My Dear Sir,—It is impossible for me to come to the meeting on Thursday evening, but it is always possible for me to say that I believe every man to be the natural owner of the fruit of his labor, and that he cannot be justly deprived of it by partial laws.

If, in accordance with the universal instincts of intelligent Christendom, an author has a right of property in his own country, he has it everywhere. It may not be as valuable to him elsewhere as it is at home, but it is his and his only : and so long as it is recognized to be his, his right in it cannot be destroyed by the customs or the connivance of the laws of another country, without the most palpable and flagrant injustice.

Even if it be proved necessary for the common welfare that the laws of his country should limit his right in his property to a certain time, still, during that time, as it is absolutely his, it cannot be appropriated by others without the greatest wrong to him.

* See Appendix (IV).

Now, since the aim of the best men in all civilized countries is that justice may be universally done,—and since in literary property what is just here is just everywhere, and since, as the old sailor said, God has somehow so fixed the world that a man can afford to do about right,—I sincerely hope that this country will lose no time in doing it.

For my part I do not ask for favors, I demand rights. If the Government of the United States protects, in England as well as at home, my rights of property in the potatoes I raise, it cannot honorably refuse to protect my equal property in the book I write. And if it chooses to offer the literary profession as a selfish sacrifice to a mistaken theory of the public welfare, it exposes itself to the fair indignation and contempt of the very class of its citizens that can forever perpetuate the memory of its injustice.

I believe that if the authors of the United States and of England, who write the same language and cherish the same literary traditions, would unite in a continuous appeal to the public opinion of the two countries, it would not be very long before Congress and Parliament would agree that honesty is the best policy ;—and some diplomatic Bancroft or Motley, or D'Israeli or Gladstone, would be as proud of negotiating a treaty to secure international literary rights, as to settle the limits of allegiance and the conditions of expatriation.

Yours very truly, GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

FROM DR. S. D. GROSS, Philadelphia.

JEFFERSON MEDICAL COLLEGE, }
Philadelphia, April 7th, 1868. }

GENTLEMEN :

I deeply regret that it will not be in my power to be with you on Thursday evening, to participate in the exercises of the proposed meeting in favor of the establishment of an International Copyright system. Such a system has long been a desideratum with American authors, notwithstanding what Mr. Carey and others may have said to the contrary ; and I sincerely hope that the appeal you are about to make to Congress may be crowned with success. Your efforts have my most cordial sympathy and good wishes. I trust that my own profession may be justly represented at your meeting. It is high time that American medical authorship should assert its rights, and endeavor to establish its claims as a legitimate branch of the general literature of the country. The works of Beck, Dunglison, Wood, Meigs, Hodge, Stille, Drake, Bedford, Hirt and Hamilton, not to mention others, some of them equally great, have created a world-wide reputation for their authors, and added lustre to the American nation.

Our medical authors have had to contend with the same difficulties as our literary authors in general. If their works have succeeded it has been because of their intrinsic merits, despite the competition of foreign works, republished in the United States, and often sold for less than one-third of the price of the native productions; without, in most cases, any substantial benefit to their authors. No one can doubt that this has been one of the great causes which have retarded the progress of American literature; and I have sometimes, in view of this important subject, regretted that we speak the same language as the people of Great Britain. With a language of our own we should have made much greater strides as a literary nation, although, it must be confessed, the masses might not have been as much enlightened as under the existing dispensation.

I have the honor to be, Gentlemen, very respectfully, your friend and obedient servant,

S. D. GROSS.

PROF. AGASSIZ, Cambridge,

Has "the securing of an International Copyright very much at heart, not only upon the common ground of honesty, but as one great step in the progress of civilization, believing that a true interchange of intellectual property between the cultivated nations of the earth, will tend to raise all their mutual relations."

A. S. ROE, East Windsor Hill, Conn.

"I have long felt there was an unwarrantable use made of the property of authors on both sides of the Atlantic. Surely, if there is any species of property that a man can claim as his own—it is that which his own mind has produced. And I think no man who has ever written a work that has sustained itself for years in the hearts of his fellow men, but has accomplished the feat by an amount of manual labor and concentrated thought, which could the world have witnessed, it would frankly acknowledge his claim to ownership. And I do not think such a man on either side the big water will be found arrayed with those who wish to deprive the laborer of his due.

Of the ten works I have written, seven of them I know have been published in England. My first book, 'James Mountjoy, or I've been Thinking,' was taken as the leading book of the Run and Read Library, and the three others as they came out.

Mr. J. C. Derby received from me from rival publishing firms for three of my works, $100 each for two, and $75 for one, which counts up in all $275, for works which have had a circulation there of over 100,000 volumes—so that even five cents a volume would have been of some consequence.

Authors, I believe, feel great delicacy in naming a value for their work, and shrink from trying to drive a bargain, and perhaps that may be the reason why in past ages they received such poor compensation. We have nothing to complain of in that respect in our day, except the lawlessness practised by individuals in England and our own country. I have lately heard that two different houses in London have advertised works under my name with the most ridiculous titles, and a gentleman in Philadelphia wrote to me to ascertain whether I was the author of those works—as he wished to have a correct list of what I had written.

Now this is hardly fair play, first to use a man's works without pay, and then to use his name to cover that which the author's mind and heart would scorn to own."

JOHN G. PALFREY, Cambridge, Mass.

"Something more than a quarter of a century ago, I set down my poor thoughts on the subject of an International Copyright law in the North American Review, of which I was editor (Vol. LV., pp. 246 et seq.). In that paper I think that there are some suggestions that deserve attention, to the point that, apart from the question of honesty, the publishers, and the trades dependent upon them, misunderstand their own interest when they oppose a copyright law."

J. T. HEADLEY, Newburgh, N. Y.

"I have not yet seen any argument against it (International Copyright) that did not apply to the propriety of abolishing copyright altogether. But however persons may differ on this point, it seems strange to me that Congress does not perceive that all legislation which discriminates against a certain class is unjust. Now it places the inventor and author on the same footing at home, and by its laws protects both in the products of their mental labor; yet, when it comes to legislate respecting them internationally, it protects the former and leaves the latter to be despoiled of his property."

WILLIAM GOODELL.

"If copyright privileges stimulate, encourage, and protect investigation, study and authorship at all, they do so in proportion to the extent to which they are rendered available and remunerative. If their benefits should not be limited by the boundary lines of the different States of the American Union, they should not be limited by the boundaries of the different nations of the civilized world. * * * The people of all nations have a common interest."

DR. DIO LEWIS, Lexington, Mass.

"Certainly no species of property should be regarded as so personal and so sacred as that which is obtained, not by some lucky speculation or other accident, but by long, patient, and exhaustive personal labor."

DR. J. G. HOLLAND, Springfield, Mass. ("Timothy Titcomb").

"I can conceive of no argument against International Copyright that does not ignore the right of an author to the work of his own brain and hand. * * * If it is desirable that America should have a literature, then it is desirable that American authorship should be protected. * * * Perhaps not one American writer in fifty has received so large a sum for copyright during the last twelve years as I have. No matter whether my books are good or bad; they have sold, and that is the only point essential to my argument. Now I assure you that I could never have written these books of mine, had I not had other sources of income; for the proceeds to me have never paid my family expenses. * * * In the general interchange and diffusion of knowledge, and since copyright privileges have hitherto promoted such interchange and diffusion in the most intelligent of the nations, it is reasonable to suppose that their further extension would be proportionately beneficial to the whole world. The tendencies of the age are strongly in the direction of universal interchange of human thought.

* * * An author may be conscious of possessing important truths, facts, and principles, that would be received with more attention and candor in another hemisphere than his own. He may hope, by influencing the leading minds, or the popular mind abroad, to reach ultimately, and more effectually, the public mind at home."

JAMES T. FIELDS, Publisher, Boston.

"We have always been heartily in favor of the passage of an equitable International Copyright Law, which shall protect the interests and secure the rights of authors on both sides of the Atlantic; and we shall always do whatever may lie in our power to promote such a result."

JAMES W. HARPER, Publisher, New York.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, April 7th, 1868.

Dear Sir,—Mr. James Harper directs me to acknowledge the receipt of your favor of yesterday, and to say that his engagements will not allow him to avail himself of your polite invitation to attend the Copyright meeting and serve as a Vice President. He desires me to thank you for your courtesies.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. W. HARPER.

WM. GILMORE SIMMS, Charleston, S. C.

"The list of names on your Memorial could have been increased by every professional name in our State. * * * My own opinions were elaborately expressed long ago, in several successive papers in the Southern Literary Messenger. These papers were held at the time by numerous men of letters—Mr. Bryant among them, to be exhaustive of the subject. I have seen no writing on the other side that was not sophistical, disingenuous, and in many particulars unqualifiedly false. I regret very much that I cannot be at your meeting."

REV. WILLIAM R. WILLIAMS, D.D.

27 GROVE STREET, NEW YORK, }
Thursday, April 9, 1868. }

Gentlemen,—Unable, as I shall be, to attend the meeting called for this evening, I forward my signature to the Petition for a Law of International Copyright.

It would seem a plain dictate of equity, that, if the laborer be worthy of his hire, and of the bread won by the sweat of his brow, the writer, the designer, and the inventor must be quite as worthy of the bread which they have won by the more bitter sweat of the brain. National reciprocity implies the international recognition of mutual benefits, as bringing after them mutual obligations and rights. The great Apostle of the Gentiles preached a religion of freest grace and benignity. But he held it not inconsistent with this freeness, that those who received the unbought boon of "spiritual things," should hold themselves bound to impart to their teachers, as wages and rent, some share of their own temporal things (1 Corinth. ix. 11). Does not the Apostolate of Letters, Science, and Art, labor under the like law? It gives generously; but expects from its beneficiaries some honest and grateful acknowledgment of that generosity. Nor would it seem to be mercenary, in asserting this rightful claim, throughout those civilized communities which are reached by this its beneficent influence. Far as it blesses the race, so far it also binds them to the graceful and grateful recognition of the advantages received. "Nobleness binds" giver and taker.

I remain, Gentlemen, yours very respectfully,

WILLIAM R. WILLIAMS.

HENRY C. CAREY, Philadelphia.

Gentlemen,—Accept my thanks for the "Right of Copyright" just now received. Can you conveniently let me have three or four other copies, that I may, to that extent, aid in its circulation? There are as many of my friends, who might not otherwise meet with it, that I would desire to place in a position to see what is the most that can be said on the opposite side. Perhaps, too, I might wish to enable them to judge how fairly my ideas are here presented.—As regards the decision at which our people must arrive, I have no fears whatever, provided only that they be enabled to see both sides of the question.

Can you give me the name and publisher's name of the pamphlet just now published by one of my "disciples," and thereby oblige

Yours, &c.,

Philadelphia, April 2, 1868.

HENRY C. CAREY.

WILLIAM M. BLACKBURN.

TRENTON, N. J., April 6, 1868.

Dear Sir,—To me it seems clear that an author should be able to have a copyright in any country where his works are published. There is a way to obtain one, I believe, but there must be duplicate Mss., and a sort of underhand process—the one expensive, the other a trick. There is something wrong in the law, when justice can be gained only by a sort of strategy.

The objection to an International Copyright which I have heard most frequently urged, is that it will make costly literature, and that authors are the only ones who are to be benefited. Authors might ask if they are not interested in a cheap literature quite as much as any body else? But are they to bear the whole expense of cheapening the popular literature? Probably flour would be at a more moderate price if the farmers would give away all the wheat that is exported from their own neighborhoods.

Not the justice, but the policy of the movement will (as it seems to me) be made the hinge on which legislation will turn—that is, the policy in favor of the publishers who oppose the measure, and not the policy in behalf of the authors. The claim will, doubtless, be that the present law favors the people—an assumption that may be questioned.

WM. M. BLACKBURN.

After the reading of the foregoing letters,

The CHAIRMAN said, that before listening to the report of the Committee appointed at the meeting of January 30th, he would like to make a few remarks, and spoke as follows :

SPEECH OF WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT.

“ We have come together, my friends, to consult on the means of giving to our laws enacted for the security of literary property a character more worthy than the one they now bear of a great, just, and highly-civilized nation. We protect the goods of a traveller landing on our coast. We allow no man to strip him of his garments, to carry off his luggage, or take possession of the wares he has brought for sale, merely because he is a stranger. If we did that, we should be deservedly regarded as having shamefully lapsed into barbarism. Yet by a singular inconsistency, while we have regulations which secure to our own citizens on our own soil their literary property, we have, nevertheless, so framed our laws that the foreigner is robbed of that property here and our own citizens plundered abroad.

“ I know that this complaint is met by some with a direct denial of the policy of protecting literary property. Let us bring this denial to a simple test. Let us suppose the copyright laws to be wholly repealed. Here is a man who has given the best years of his life to laborious historical research. He has produced a work destined to live, accurate and copious in its facts, admirable in arrangement, interesting in style. Or, perhaps, here is a man of science, who with equal toil has composed a work of great and decided utility. This author puts his work to press, and naturally expects the reward of his useful labors. In a day or two there comes out a reprint of his book by another publisher, which monopolizes the market, and prevents the sale of his own edition. Another man is enriched by his labors. The case needs only to be stated, and the statement is an argument of itself. Does not every body see that here is a rank injustice committed—a cruel wrong? Can any thing be more mean, more base, more abhorrent to our notions of right? Does not every noble and generous instinct in our bosoms tell us that the only corrective of this wrong is to decree by law that literary property shall be, like other property, inviolable ?

" But it is again said that literature consists of ideas, and ideas are the common possession of all mankind, in which there can be no exclusive property. I readily grant that ideas are, in themselves, common stock, and yet I maintain the right of the author to his works. It is the form in which the ideas are put that is the author's property. Nor is this the only example of the kind. What is more the common property of all men than the waters of the ocean ? They belong to no one more than to another. Yet if I take a portion of them, and by my skill and diligence convert it into salt, the product is mine as incontestably as the watch in my pocket. In its original form it belonged to nobody ; in the form which I have given it, it belongs to me alone ; and he who appropriates it to himself without my permission, is a thief.

" Thirty-six years since, I was for the first time in one of the forests of the Western States, in Illinois, then almost a wilderness. By my side stood a squatter, who directed my attention to a pile of straight trunks of trees, which had been cut down and the tops and branches lopped away. ' These trees,' he said, ' have been felled by somebody for his own use. This forest is the public domain ; nobody lays claim to it, and these trees belong to nobody in particular. But as soon as they are cut down, we recognize them as the property of him who took the trouble to fell them ; and if any person but he should take them, he would be disgraced and regarded as having stolen them.' I listened, and honored the squatters of Illinois for thus respecting the sacredness of property.

" Let me apply these illustrations. The author of a book comes to the great ocean of human thought which belongs to all ; he dips up a portion of the brine, evaporates it, causes it to crystallize, purifies the crystals from unpleasant ingredients, and presents it in a new form, a form by which it is made his own. He enters the great forest of ideas, which is common ground, hews down trees, shapes them into articles of furniture, or builds a house with them, and he who takes from him that furniture is a thief, and he who breaks into that house is a burglar. The author clothes ideas in words of his own selection, forms the words into sentences of his own construction, gives the ideas his own arrangement, combines and illustrates them in his own manner, and in this state they are his own, made so by his labor, skill and invention, and they belong as properly to him as the product of salt-works on the edge of the sea belongs to the manufacturer.

" What is a promissory note but an idea—an idea put into a certain form of expression ? What is a bill of exchange, what is a bank note, but a form of words authenticated by a name, and the name is the mere sign of an idea? Yet there is nothing to which the universal reverence for property more strongly attaches itself, and no kind of property which the law secures to its rightful owner with more vigilance and with sterner sanctions. He who makes too free with ideas in this shape is delivered over to ignominious punishment; formerly, under a ruder administration of justice, his ears were cropped.

"The right of literary property being thus clearly established, and shown to rest on the same principles as all other property, it remains that we give it such equitable scope and application as shall vindicate our laws from the imputation of unjust partiality and a short-sighted devotion to self-interest. We must so recognize the rights of those by whom this species of property is produced that neither shall the stranger be robbed here because he is a stranger, nor the American robbed in foreign lands for the same reason. I hope to see the time when it will be held as disgraceful to counterfeit a man's book as to counterfeit his bill of exchange. You will hear this subject more ably discussed this evening than I can pretend to discuss it. It will be shown clearly that in this matter the equitable and the politic course are the same, and that in this instance, as in every other exercise of even-handed justice, the respect we pay to the rights of others will bring with it its own reward."

Mr. JAMES PARTON, of the Committee referred to by the Chairman, next made the following:

R E P O R T.

At a meeting held January 30, 1868, at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, to consider the question of International Copyright, a committee of five was appointed to suggest a plan of operations for the friends of the measure, and, especially, to ascertain whether an international copyright could be secured by treaty, or required an act of Congress. This committee now beg leave respectfully to report.

They directed their attention, first, to procuring the requisite preliminary information from Washington. Upon applying to the Hon. Charles Sumner, the committee received the following reply:

SENATE CHAMBER, 17th February, 1868.

MY DEAR SIR,

Pardon my delay.

There are two ways of dealing with the question of International Copyright; one is by the treaty power, and the other is by reciprocal legislation.

I have always thought that the former was the easiest; but at the present moment the House of Representatives is not disposed to concede much to the treaty power.

Mr. Everett, while Secretary of State, negotiated a treaty on this subject with Great Britain, which was submitted to the Senate, reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, considered in the Senate, and finally left on the table, without any definitive vote.

I shall send you a copy of this treaty, which, I believe, has never seen the light.

I have always been in favor of an International Copyright, as justice to authors and a new stage in the unity of nations. Perhaps the condition of public affairs at this time, the pre-occupation of the public mind, the imminence of the Presidential election, and also the alienation from England, may present temporary obstacles. But I am sanguine that at last the victory will be won. If authors should have a copyright, they should have it everywhere within the limits of civilization.

Accept my best wishes, and believe me, dear sir,

Faithfully yours, CHARLES SUMNER.

JAMES PARTON, Esq., Secretary of the Committee.

A copy of the treaty, negotiated by Mr. Everett and Mr. John F. Crampton, accompanied Mr. Sumner's letter. This treaty provided, that Authors, Artists, Designers, Engravers and Composers of Music, who were entitled to copyright in one country, should be entitled to it in the other, on the same terms and for the same length of time; so that the piracy of an American work by an English publisher, or that of an English work by an American publisher, entitled the author to the same redress as though the piracy had been perpetrated in his own country.

This treaty was read in the Senate for the first time, February 24th, 1853. It was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, who reported it without amendment, March 15, 1853. On the 5th of April following, it was read a second time, considered in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to lie on the table, from which it was never taken.

As the treaty provided that it should be ratified, if at all, within twelve months from the date of signature, which was February 7th, 1853, the document has no longer any vitality, except as it does honor to the memory of the distinguished men whose names are appended to it.

During the delay which occurred in procuring this information, the Committee were gratified to learn that an International Copyright bill had been introduced into the House of Representatives by the Hon. John D. Baldwin, of Massachusetts, Chairman of the Library Committee. They were the more gratified, because they desire the measure to have the sanction of both houses of Congress, as well as the approval of the public. An act of justice so advanced and refined as this, and involving benefits so numerous and far-reaching, will be an honor to every nation concerned in it. It is desirable, therefore, that it should be, on the part of the United States, a national act, in which every branch of the Government and the whole people shall concur.

The bill presented by Mr. Baldwin is similar in design to the treaty of Mr. Everett, but contains additional provisions. The treaty of 1853 contemplated only an arrangement between the United States and Great Britain; but the pending bill aims to extend the system to all countries willing to participate in its advantages.

Mr. Baldwin's bill, which was read twice in the House of Representatives, February 21st, 1868, and recommitted, may now be considered before the country for discussion and amendment. The members of the Library Committee, we are assured, desire to make the bill as satisfactory to parties immediately concerned as justice will permit.

They wish to accomplish the object with as little disturbance to the established system, and with as little inconvenience to the book-trade and public, as possible. This meeting, therefore, has been convened for the purpose of further considering the subject, and giving both to the friends and opponents of the measure an opportunity to express their sentiments upon it.

The Committee propose for the consideration of the meeting the following resolutions :

Resolved, That Authors, Artists, Engravers, Designers, and Composers of Music should have legal right to permit, forbid, and control, absolutely and everywhere on earth, the multiplication and sale of copies of their works ; so that no copy of a book, essay, picture, statue, engraving, musical work, or design can rightfully exist anywhere, until the consent of the author thereto has been first manifested or obtained.

Resolved, That the government of a country is bound to protect the property and rights of its citizens, wherever in the world those rights may be infringed, or their property plundered.

Resolved, That since the leading nations of Europe have manifested in various ways, and at various times, their willingness to enter into an international arrangement for the reciprocal protection of the claims of authors and artists, we are, as a people, in fault for not having long ago responded to their desire, and joined them in such an arrangement.

Resolved, That a just system of International Copyright, by rendering the business of publishing books and works of art more stable, safe, and legitimate, will make it also more extensive and profitable, to the advantage of all who are concerned in the manufacture or sale of such products.

Resolved, That while the present system tends to make bad books cheap, and good books dear, an International Copyright system will have the opposite tendency of making good books cheap and bad ones dear ; because it will afford to good books the market of the world, while inferior works, besides being confined to localities, will have to deal with a public always advancing in taste and knowledge.

Resolved, That the bill now pending in the House of Representatives, is substantially wise and right, though probably susceptible of additions and amendments ; and that the thanks of the friends of the measure are due to the Hon. John D. Baldwin, and his colleagues upon the Committee, for their labors hitherto bestowed upon this important subject.

Resolved, That an association be formed for the purpose of securing the rights of Authors and Publishers among the civilized nations of the earth, and persons desirous of coöperating are requested to enroll their names.

GEORGE P. PUTNAM,
S. IRENEUS PRIME,
HENRY IVISON,
JAMES PARTON,
EGBERT HASARD.

The REV. S. IRENÆUS PRIME moved the adoption of the foregoing resolutions, and said :

SPEECH OF S. IRENÆUS PRIME.

MR. CHAIRMAN : In rising to move the adoption of the resolutions just read, I wish to say that this is a movement in behalf of American authors, and American publishers who wish to do justice to all authors, native and foreign alike. It is not a cry for charity ; it is a demand for justice. It is not asking for privileges ; it is the assertion of rights. And as all rights have corresponding duties, it is the duty of government to secure authors' rights.

In the year 1784, the year after our National Independence was recognized by treaty with Great Britain, an English publisher seized upon Morse's Geography, an American copyright work of great literary and pecuniary value, and published it without recognition of the rights of the author, and without making him the least compensation. That system of piracy thus begun has been relentlessly pursued by the British, with a disregard of our rights which has justified the remonstrances of authors and publishers, and which they have bitterly and often complained of, these many years. It is true that Jonathan has now and then made reprisals, and it is quite likely in this as in many other things he has beaten John Bull at his own game. But they have in the last eighty years taken 1,500 of our copyright books and reprinted them without so much as saying "by your leave, sir." Is it strange that John Bull raises a great cry of "Stop thief?" Is it strange that he says if we will stop, he will, and we will have a mutual understanding, an International Copyright law that shall secure the rights of an author or publisher in foreign countries, as well as the rights of a merchant or planter ?

If an author is the owner of the book he has made, or the composer has the right of property in the music his soul has sung and his hand has scored, or if the artist has such ownership in the landscape he has painted that no other man has a right to make a copy of it without the author's consent, then the copyright question at home and abroad, everywhere, is settled. It is robbery to invade that right. Now get down to the basis of the rights of property, and the author or inventor's title is as perfect and indefeasible as that of any other man to the fruit and reward of his labor. Webster says, "No right or title to a thing can be so perfect as that which is created by man's own labor and invention. The exclusive right of a man to his literary productions, and to the use of them for his own profit, is entire and perfect as the faculties employed and labor bestowed are entirely and perfectly his own."

But this self-evident proposition, this fact so simply true and palpably just that a child can apprehend it, is actually and boldly denied in the interest of confederate wrong. A pamphlet has been recently published denying the right of property to an author, taking the ground that a copyright law is merely a privilege granted by society to an author, and to be resumed at its sovereign pleasure. "The man who makes a book" says Mr. Carey, "uses the common property of mankind, and all he furnishes is the workmanship. Society permits him to use its property, but it is on condition that after a certain time, the whole shall become part of the common stock."

And again he says that an author is in the condition of a man who goes into another man's garden and picks flowers; he may smell the bouquet "for an hour or two," but it belongs to the owner of the garden!

And Mr. Carey says authors' right in the books they publish is precisely similar to, and no greater than, that of the man who culls the flowers and arranges the bouquets."

That is to say, authors have no rights at all. We all remember with what amazed indignation the civilized world received the dogma that black men have no rights which white men are bound to respect; but Mr. Carey degrades the race of authors still lower, as I will now demonstrate. He says:

"The day has passed in this country, for the recognition of either perpetuity or universality of literary rights. The wealthy Carolinian, anxious that books might be high in price, and knowing well that monopoly privileges were opposed to freedom, gladly co-operated with Eastern authors and publishers, anti-slavery as they professed to be. The enfranchised black on the contrary, desires that books may be cheap, and to that end he and his representatives will be found in all the future co-operating with the people of the Centre and the West in maintaining the doctrine that literary privileges exist in virtue of grants from the people who own the materials out of which books are made; that those privileges have been perhaps already too far extended; that there exists not even a shadow of reason for any further extension; and that to grant what now is asked would be a positive wrong to the many millions of consumers, as well as an obstacle to be now placed in the road towards civilization."

That is, authors have no rights which white or black men are bound to respect. The doctrine is flagitious and immoral in the extreme. It is a disgrace to the civilization and christianity even of this swindling age. It promises to enact iniquity by law. The author of the doctrine is upright and honest, but his doctrine is neither; sir, that doctrine would be laughed at by every intelligent and honest negro in the United States.

When such doctrines are thrust forward to shield old abuses, and perpetuate hereditary wrongs, it is time that the enlightened moral sense of the country rose up, armed and strong to overthrow it. It is the old battle of right against might which is always being fought, and which you yourself, Mr. President, have told us, in immortal words, will by-and-by be won for truth. Millions of money are now ready to be spent in defeating this claim of authors to have justice at the hands of their country. But on the other side is intelligence, virtue, and righteousness, which is peace and joy in the whole earth.

The remarks of Mr. Bryant and Dr. Prime were heard with the closest interest and frequent applause. FRANCIS LIEBER, LL. D., was the next speaker, and made the following comprehensive presentation of the historical phases of the question before the meeting :

SPEECH OF FRANCIS LIEBER.

MR. CHAIRMAN : I beg to express my entire concurrence with the resolutions now before this meeting. My views and my convictions on a law of International Copyright agree with those expressed in the letters of the distinguished persons, which have been read to us.

It is a fact worthy of notice that the objections now made to International Copyright, as you have seen from the extracts read by the Rev. Gentleman who preceded me, are the self-same objections which have been made each time the subject has been before Congress, and when International Copyright was first discussed in Europe. It was so when Mr. Everett, as Secretary of State, endeavored to settle this question by treaty ; it was so when, in 1839 or 1840, I forget which, Senators Clay and William C. Preston, and other prominent men in Congress and out of it, among whom was Washington Irving, endeavored to obtain the same end by an Act of Congress, and when, let me add, several, if I recollect, most of our conspicuous publishing houses were in favor of it, expressing their opinions then entertained in sundry petitions. It was so when the subject came to be discussed for the first time in history. At least it was the first time so far as I am acquainted with the history of this move in the progress of civilization.

When unhappy Germany was hacked into petty sovereignties, an author or a publisher to whom an author had sold his manuscript, had to go begging for a copyright from sovereign to sovereign. It was thus that Schiller and Goethe were obliged first to publish their immortal works—Austria rarely, if ever, granting a copyright to a non-Austrian. After the restoration of Germany, such as it was, in 1815, an International Copyright between the German States came loudly to be called for, after the Act of Germanic Union had declared that a German International Copyright should be a fit subject for discussion and possible legislation of the confederacy. Prussia took the initiative. Judge Hitzig of the Supreme Court of the kingdom was consulted. He had been thrown out of his judicial career, when, by the issue of the battle of Jena, Prussia was reduced well-nigh to a political nullity. Hitzig, to support himself, became bookseller. After the restoration of Prussia he received an appointment on the supreme bench, and as I have stated he was consulted concerning the new copyright. The Austrian booksellers raised an almost unanimous cry against it. Austria, the least prominent of German States in literary production, had long made a pretty good profit upon pirated editions of German classics, and was unwilling to give up this fine trade. The writers against the proposed International Copyright used then the reasons in favor of bibliopolic buccaneering, which are used now. They may be reduced to two heads. It is maintained that there is no such thing as literary property. What is called so is simply the effect of laws, judiciously or injudiciously enacted; it is an arbitrary creature of the law; and secondly, expediency leads us to prevent an International Copyright. Let us have books as cheap as possible.

The chief value of the latter reason depends on the first; for if there is such a thing as a right of real property in literary productions, as natural and direct as there is in a bushel of wheat for the farmer, if he is the producer, the argument founded on expediency, even if this could be made good, would have no more value than a recommendation of obtaining flour cheaper by stealing, than by honestly purchasing it. Right and wrong are not defined or confined by the blue or red colors of political demarcations on the map, any more than that they apply to religion, or mathematics, or music. Nay, allow a teacher of the law of nations to say that it is one of the characteristics of our progressive civilization, that as it advances, it takes more and more from the meaning of the colors of the map, reducing them more and more to a political meaning alone.

Is there such a thing as literary property? The main roots of all property whatsoever are appropriation and production, diffused and accumulated by exchange. Why? Is it, because, as the saying used to be, property is the creature of Government? By no means. Property invariably precedes government, as many other institutions do. It is because every human being is as conscious as of his own identity, that if he appropriates what belongs to no one—for instance, the trunk of a tree—and if he produces a new thing—for instance a canoe out of that tree—this appropriation, or this product, is verily his own; that he can do with it what he likes, and that every one who in turn attempts to appropriate it without the process of exchange, is an intruder, a robber, and the attempt will not only be resisted but resented. The whole right of property, however developed and ramified in a code of laws it may be, rests on this primordial consciousness of mine and thine—on appropriation and production; and I now appeal to the intuitive conviction of every living man to say whether a literary work, say Baker's description of his toilsome journeys in Africa, or a Faust of Goethe, a musical composition, say a requiem by Mozart, is not a production in the fullest sense of the word, even more so than a barrel of herrings which have been appropriated in the North Sea, pickled and barrelled by the fisherman; and whether any one has a right to meddle with this property by production, any more than you or I have to meddle with the barrel of herrings.

But, say our opponents, that which you call the literary work consists of ideas which were common property, gathered, strung together. They belong to the common civilization, and cannot constitute property. Indeed! why not go further? The alphabet used in every book is common property; the words of which it consists have been published long ago in dictionaries.

We do not claim property in ideas, any more than Beethoven claimed property in the tones he indicated, or the laws of harmony and disharmony which the Creator has indelibly implanted in the human soul; but he justly claimed by natural right the ownership of his symphonies, and, therefore, the exclusive right of multiplying them by signs and on material. He deeply resented their piratical reprint.

An author, or a composer, or an artist is what he is, in a very great measure indeed, in consequence of the civilization of his times or of the ideas which, erroneously and inelegantly, are declared common property; but is the farmer what he is, less by the common civilization in which his existence has fallen? Does the farmer, perchance, create his grain, or does he only produce, that is, dispose his combining and shaping agency so that with the help of the natural agents his labor results in, the grain? His share in agricultural production is small, indeed, compared to the share which the author, or composer, or sculptor has in the production of his work. But the question is really more positively and directly answered by asking: Do you, or do you not, feel and know that Paradise Lost was Milton's own, and that in the world of exchange to which, by divine decree, all of us must go for subsistence, he had an exclusive right to dispose of his work?

If literary property is merely a thing so called; if there is no natural right of literary property, why does our law and the municipal law of every civilized country acknowledge and protect it in each respective country? There is no exception to it. And if literary property is real property, why not acknowledge and protect it internationally, as all righteous property is?

To the objection that literary property is of a very recent date, which is said to prove that, like the patent law, it is altogether a legal invention, and originates from no natural right, I would simply reply that literary property was claimed as soon as it obtained importance in the market, that is, immediately after the invention of the art of printing. There is a passage in the works of Dr. Martin Luther,* in which he asks the "Sirs Printers" why they rob one another, and make money of what belongs to another, leaving only loss and dissatisfaction to him who incurred all the expenses in order to get out a book; and it will be remembered how short a time there elapsed between the humanizing invention of the art of printing and the great translation of the Bible by one man—Martin Luther. As to International Copyright, it belongs to our century indeed; but the whole law of nations has made its greatest strides only in recent times. Down to this century, the highest statesmanship was believed to consist in the greatest amount of injury that could be done to a neighbor. The barbarous confusion of foreigner and enemy still somewhat adhered to our race. Now it is gladly acknowledged in the commonwealth of nations to which we belong that the great law of good neighborhood, all-important among individuals, is not less so among nations, and the existing positive law of nations shows us that treaties are in force between Germany, France, England, Italy, internationally protecting literary and æsthetical copyright. Why should we lag behind? We, whose boast it is to honor and protect human rights with eager jealousy, should we, of all leading nations, disregard the right of property, because the owner is a foreigner? In these very days the German parliament has passed an instruction to the imperial chancellor, Count Bismarck, to exert himself that treaties be concluded between Germany and the different foreign powers which shall protect all private property, even belonging to belligerents at sea, against seizure. There has already once existed a treaty of a similar effect between the United States and Prussia. It were well if Germany and our country would renew this treaty. It would be a stride indeed in the career of civilization; but would it not be well at once to do the plainer justice of passing the International Copyright bill now before Congress? I call upon every one to do what may lie in his power toward the promotion of this object.

We are here necessarily restricted in the time during which we may address this audience, and I see that I must leave to others to descant on the expediency of an international copyright. I ask you only to let me add this unqualified declaration, that so far as my inquiry and observation have gone—and it is ample, and dates far back—I have found that almost without an exception all men of fairness and judgment, free from real or supposed business interests, unhesitatingly pronounce themselves in favor of not limiting the validity of the eighth commandment by Colton's colors, and that my conviction is that in this sphere, as in every other, it will be found that honesty is the best policy. I am far from presenting to you foreign authors as the poor benefactors who must be protected. The enervating trash which we receive is boundless, but on the one hand, is the protection of property ever measured by the degree of direct good it does? and, on the other hand, it is ourselves, too, that insist on International Copyright for our own benefit or as a thing due to us.

* This passage is given in a pamphlet on International Copyright by the speaker, published in 1840, by Wiley & Putnam, New York.

Let us by all means support our representatives who are ready to do all they can towards the passage of an American Copyright Act.

The REV. SAMUEL OSGOOD, D. D. followed Prof. Lieber, and discussed "THE UNITY OF NATIONS AND ITS BEARING UPON LETTERS," in language of which we give a general outline.

SPEECH OF SAMUEL OSGOOD.

Dr. Osgood said that he consented to speak in order to comply with the request of friends, rather than from any ability or knowledge on his part that entitled him to treat so important a subject as the international rights of authors. He was glad, however, in the branch of the topic assigned to him, and could say a few words heartily upon the unity of nations in its relation to authors.

There can be no doubt of the fact, that nations are coming together as never before, and that what Goldwin Smith calls the commonwealth of mankind is evolving itself throughout the civilized world, and even invading pagan lands with its mighty missionary power of industry, science and art. It already had two universal languages,—those of music, and mathematics,—and the musical scale and the multiplication table were known and understood throughout the globe. Literature is rising into the same universality and carrying its name and its calculations into all lands, and with the help of the photographer and the engineer, it is expounding the secret of the Egyptian hieroglyphics, and speaking a new pictorial tongue to the eyes of all mankind.

The important question rises, what bearing is this universality of communication to have upon the individual rights of authors? Is the whole of the reading public to be sacrificed to the part of authors, or is the part to be sacrificed to the whole, or are the whole and the part to be bound together by mutual obligation and service? The laborer is worthy of his hire, in all vineyards, and good wages should bring good work and the welfare of laborer and employer, producer and consumer. It is utter folly to say that literary work shall not be paid for by all who have its productions, and it is equal folly to maintain that the literary workman shall work for himself and shut the great world out from a fair share of the fruits of his labors. The author should be paid for his personal labor, time, capital and talent, yet he must expect to have his ideas pass into the common stock of human thought, and no more think to keep great truths to himself as private property because he has ably stated them, than Newton should claim the law of gravitation as his private property, because he first stated it in its scientific form, and identified it with his own name. Give the author the right to the sale of his own works wherever published, and the great human mind will soon appropriate all that is of universal worth, and make it portion of the common stock of knowledge. So the author gets his due, and humanity keeps its birthright of reason and liberty.

The laws of trade effectually confirm this sound principle of philosophy, and secure the rights of the author and also the liberty of the public. All excessive charges and arbitrary restrictions in behalf of copyright are foolish as well as wrong, and it is proved that a moderate percentage on liberal terms is better for all parties than any extortion on the part of publisher or author. Large sales with moderate profits is the rule of modern business, and ten or fifteen per cent. on copyright brings an author more money as well as fame than fifty or sixty per cent. Perhaps it would be a gain to a popular author like Dickens to charge only a very small percentage on the sale of his works in America, should the liberty be given him to have his dues and discount returns from all publishers of his charming books. The cheaper the publication within the limits of reason, the greater the sales and the larger the profits.

It will be found that a better order of books will be published if authors are sure of having the whole market for the sale of their products. Certain works of speculative genius or scientific depth need the readers from all nations to secure a paying return, and England or America is too small sometimes to defray the expense of publishing a work of first-class merit. England nearly starved out that masterly thinker Herbert Spencer, and not the justice of America, but the generosity of Americans, came to his rescue and enabled him to go on with this enterprise. I see here to-night the author of a great Church history that ought to make him independent, and if Dr. Schaff had his due from all Christendom who read him, he would have money to lend as well as to live upon, instead of being probably limited mainly to his salary as theological teacher. I have been asked to translate and publish Rothe's great work on Theological Ethics, the greatest book of our time on that subject, but if I had the time and learning for the task, the sale of three volumes in America would not pay me a dollar a day for my labor, or keep soul and body together. Let all the readers of the best class of books contribute together to compensate authors, and a higher grade of literature would appear, and researches that can now be pursued only by men of fortune like Prescott, Bancroft, and their peers, would be open to all men of adequate ability whom publishers could assure of a sufficient market for their works, and enable them to prepare for the task.

Dr. Osgood thought that society at large would be the gainer by allowing men of letters to have the fair profit of their works. Mind is more than money, yet money is a very nice thing for mind to have at its command. There was a good deal of meaning in the act of the poor parson who borrowed ten dollars every Saturday night, and handed it back every Monday morning, and when asked why he borrowed money that he did not use, replied that he liked to know that he had the money in his pocket while he was preaching, for it made him feel more like a man to have it there. It would be well to give Brains the means of meeting Bullion on a more equal footing in the world, and while many of our moneyed men had a liberal spirit, as a class they were too narrow and domineering, and would be much improved by the influence of a class of men of letters with culture, and fame, and also the income to enable them to dispense a generous and refined hospitality, in homes open to genuine worth, above the rule of caste and the dynasty of dollars.

He ended by wishing for the day when literature, which is the most generous and humane of arts, should be freed from the piracy that has been driven from all other spheres, and our motto should be "Fair Trade and Author's Rights."

THE HON. HORACE GREELEY

was here called upon, and, taking the platform, made a most effective and characteristic speech, in which he reviewed the right and wrong of the question, and with good-humored satire exposed the fallacies and selfishness of the various pleas set forth by the opponents of International Copyright. Mr. Greeley's remarks greatly enlivened the meeting, and it is a matter of regret that they were not reported for publication.

The Rev. PHILIP SCHAFF, D.D., was the final speaker. His remarks were brief and to the point.

SPEECH OF PHILIP SCHAFF.

Three arguments may be urged in favor of an International Copyright,—a material, a legal, and a moral, or interest, justice, and honor. I would place the first lowest and the last highest.

Literature, it must be admitted, is no ordinary merchandise. Like virtue, it carries in itself the best reward. When it is cultivated from mercenary motives, it loses its moral force. The greatest authors died poor, and yet made many rich, and enjoy the gratitude of posterity in proportion to the disinterestedness of their labor. An author writes from a free impulse for the purpose of spreading truth and useful information among his fellow-men. He seeks first of all the kingdom of truth. For my own part, I feel grateful to foreign publishers and translators for extending my sphere of usefulness by the republication of half a dozen of my works, although I derived no benefit from them, except from German publishers in three or four cases. It is better for the world that a good book should be reproduced in foreign lands and tongues, without profit to the author, than that it should be confined to his own country.

Nevertheless, "the laborer is worthy of his hire," and this applies to mental as well as physical labor. Literary property, next to moral character, is the highest kind of property. And if the right to literary property holds good anywhere, it holds good everywhere within the bounds of civilization, subject only to such limitations as the interests of civilization require. This principle is now universally conceded in Europe. We acknowledge it ourselves as far as our own country is concerned. Why should we any longer refuse to extend it to other countries? The very first object of government is to protect the rights of person and property, as far as its influence extends.

But I would urge mainly the consideration of national honor. We do ourselves great injustice as long as we deny to foreign authors and publishers what we would have them do to our own. It is mortifying to our pride and just self-respect to hear our publishers so often denounced abroad as a set of literary pirates. American publishers, as a class, are as honorable and highminded men as any on the globe. But the whole profession is unjustly made to suffer from the absence of a law that would effectually shield them against reproach and calumny, as well as against the temptation to take advantage of the absence of such a law.

Our government then owes it to its own dignity, to the reputation and higher interests of our authors and publishers, and to the claims of modern civilization, to enact an International Copyright. Let it lose no time to enter, either by treaty or reciprocal legislation, into an arrangement similar to the one which already exists between England,

Germany, and France. If literature is the true glory of a country, then we have a right to demand from our government to be the foremost in extending the protection of its laws to the cause of letters and arts. Then we may expect a literature to grow up in this country that shall answer to the vast expanse of our territory from ocean to ocean, the genius of our institutions, and the noble destiny of our nation as the central and most universal nation on earth.

The resolutions presented by Mr. Parton were here unanimously adopted, and the following agreement was presented for signatures to those present, and received a large number of names :

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT ASSOCIATION.

We, the undersigned, agree to unite in a Copyright Association, for the protection and advancement of Literature and Art, and the committee in charge of the present meeting are requested to call an early convention of enrolled members.

It was stated that this agreement would remain open for signatures at the office of Mr. Putnam, No. 661 Broadway, and the meeting then adjourned.

EDMUND C. STEDMAN,
Secretary of the Meeting.

APPENDIX.

I.

THE RIGHT OF COPYRIGHT.

A CONCISE STATEMENT OF THE QUESTION, BY S. IRENÆUS PRIME.

[From Putnam's Monthly Magazine, for May, 1868.]

1. Proudhon's motto was, "Property is robbery." He denied the right of property. All things, in his view, belong to all men in common. The earth, the air, fire, water, the natural forces, all sources of wealth, are common stock, and the results of their use are the universal heritage of mankind.

2. H. C. Carey has promulgated a theory of copyright substantially on the same basis. Ideas are the common property of mankind. Facts are everybody's facts. Words are free to all men. He says: "Examine Macaulay's History of England, and you will find that the body is composed of what is common property." He says the same of Prescott, Bancroft and Webster: "They did nothing but reproduce ideas that were common property." Of Scott and Irving he says, they "made no contribution to knowledge."

3. Therefore, the author of a book has no right of property in the book he has made. He took the common stock and worked it over; and one man has just as good a right to it as another. A law to give an author the exclusive control of his book is not founded in justice. The public are deprived of their rights, if the author is allowed to be the owner of his own works. Property in books is robbery.

4. There is no substantial difference between the Proudhon theory of no property, and the Carey theory of no property in books. The first breaks down all business; the second destroys all business in books. If Smith shall have the same right with Jones to the house Jones builds, Jones will not be apt to build houses. If Carey has the same right to Motley's "History" that Motley has, Motley will not be inclined to write histories for Carey.

A disciple of Carey has recently put forth a pamphlet, in which he takes the position that "the word property is only applicable to material substances;" and a "person's ideas or thoughts are his intellectual property only so long as they remain unuttered, and unknown to others." It is a reproach upon our country, and upon the Christianity of our age, that a doctrine like this is avowed by any civilized man among us. Noah Webster defines the word thus:

Property.—The exclusive right of possessing, enjoying, and disposing of a thing; ownership. Prior occupancy of land and of wild animals, gives to the possessor the property of them. The labor of inventing, making, or producing anything, constitutes one of the highest and most indefeasible titles of property.

And that no possible misunderstanding may arise as the meaning, he defines again :

Literary Property.—No right or title to a thing can be so perfect as that which is created by a man's own labor and invention. The exclusive right of a man to his literary productions, and to the use of them for his own profit, is entire and perfect, as the faculties employed and labor bestowed are entirely and perfectly his own. On what principle, then, can a legislature or court determine that an author can enjoy only a temporary property in his own productions? If a man's right to his own property in writing is as perfect as to the productions of his farm, or his shop, how can the former be abridged or limited, while the latter is held without limitations? Why do the productions of manual labor reach higher in the scale of rights of property than the production of the intellect?

5. Civilized society has recognized the right of property in all ages and lands, even independently of the eighth and tenth commandments. The right of an author to the fruit of his labor and intellect is as perfect and indefeasible as the right of the farmer to his crop. Common materials are employed by men of all pursuits, but whatever each man's industry, genius, or skill produces is his own, his property; and he who takes it from him without his consent, or uses it against his will, is a thief and a robber. This is the essence of property in an invention, or a photograph, or a map, or a book.

6. Therefore, law shields an author by a copyright, and all persons are restrained from publishing his works without his consent. The historian composes his history, and has an exclusive right to it. The poet owns his own poem. The dramatist owns the drama that he writes. The author has law to shield him against robbery, as the merchant or farmer has. This right is not a concession by society to the author, as Mr. Carey says it is. The right is absolute and intrinsic as any other right recognized among men.

7. Limiting the time during which this right of the author shall continue to be recognized by law, is an error arising from the confusion of ideas as to the nature of the right. The right being perfect, and all rights and duties being reciprocal, it is the duty of government to make their protection co-extensive with the right, which is perpetual. When it is made legal for a man to live rent free in a house after he has paid rent for it twenty-eight years, or to have a newspaper for nothing when he has been a paying subscriber forty years, then, but not till then, should authors be deprived of their property, after the public has paid for the use of it a limited number of years.

8. American authors have a just claim upon their government for such legislation as will enable them to enjoy the benefit of their works, when they are wanted in foreign countries. Such protection requires reciprocity; and if it be just to American authors to secure their rights in foreign lands, it is right and necessary that foreign authors have corresponding protection in the United States.

9. An International Copyright law is, therefore, simple justice between man and man. The author's moral right being perfect, as the right of any other person to his property, government is bound to make the legal right commensurate therewith. Unless we make war upon all property, and abolish the distinctions of meum and tuum altogether, we must admit the duty of governments to secure the rights of authors in their property at home and abroad. And as law protects the American merchants' gold in London, so should law, by reciprocal legislation, make the author's right to his property equally secure.

10. The slave trade, once regarded as a moral and respectable traffic, was prosecuted by the best men in the Church and world.

Lotteries were once legal and reputable, and the government, churches, schools, and individuals participated in their profits without scruple.

Now the slave trade is justly punished as piracy, and lotteries as gambling and robbery. But the slave trade and lottery are now no more in reality offensive to good morals than they were when both flourished under the wing of the Church and the State. The public conscience having been enlightened and quickened, it is now a subject for wonder that honest and honorable men were ever engaged in either. It is hardly credible, but it is true, that the good people of Newport, Rhode Island, had twelve ships trading at one time with Cuba and Surinam, "bringing molasses to be distilled into New England rum, which was sent to Africa in exchange for negro slaves."

When the public conscience is awakened to the right of authors in their works, the Carey theory will be looked upon by all conscientious persons as flagitious and immoral as Proudhon's doctrine or the Newport trade in rum and negroes.

Then government will not suffer its people to plunder a foreign author, nor allow its own authors to be plundered in foreign lands; and then no honest publisher will violate the right of an author, whether the law shields him or not.

11. It is always for the interest of individuals and communities, in the long run, to do right; It never is for their interest to do wrong. In this case the interests of the publisher, the printer, the paper-maker, and the reader, are promoted by doing justly by the author. The partial protection of an author's rights which the law now gives is a powerful stimulant to literary laborer. Literature cannot be a profession without it. Men will not plant orchards, if the fruit is free to all comers. Men will not devote their lives to making books unless they can live by it. The Copyright Law gives them this security. And an International Copyright law would add a market, in many millions of people, to that now enjoyed by American authors. This encouragement would enhance the production in proportion to the new demand. The amount of British literature offered to our market would be vastly increased; and American authorship, protected throughout the realms of the English language, would hasten to win the same triumphs that American genius has achieved in the mechanical arts. The healthful competition in the manufacture of books thus stimulated would keep down the prices to the lowest remunerative point, and the extended field would furnish a demand for books so vast as to require all the energies of our book trade to supply.

In this case, as always, "Honesty is the best policy." And degrading as it is to appeal to such a sentiment where the right is so palpable, we may rejoice in the fact that the interests of publishers and readers are here identical with the rights of authors.

NOTE—by a Publisher.

* One of the most specious and effective arguments reiterated against international justice in this matter, is the statement that, if British authors are paid for the use of their books in this country, an enormous addition will be made to the price of the books—that we shall have to pay the price of new books in England—a guinea and a half for a novel, &c., &c.

The fallacy, not to say dishonesty, of this statement, may be readily shown by any intelligent and candid publisher.

The copyright of an English book being vested in an American citizen, and the book being manufactured in this country (as Mr. Baldwin's bill proposes), it will be for the selfish interest of the publisher to adapt the book to the taste and means of the largest number of purchasers—in just the same way as he would manage a book by the American author.

When it is evident that the sale of five thousand, ten thousand, or fifty thousand copies at a dollar will "pay" better than five hundred copies at five dollars, the publisher's policy is self-evident. His interests are identified, both with those of the author and with those of the great mass of readers. To illustrate this obvious truth, it is sufficient to mention the last new and notable copyright book—Beecher's "Norwood." It was competent for Mr. Bonner, owner of the copyright, or the monopoly, and Mr. Scribner, the publisher, to determine that the price of the book shall be three or five dollars, and nobody could say nay. What do they do? They voluntarily and wisely sell it for a dollar and a half—a less price actually than is now asked for most reprinted books of the same size which pay no copyright; and yet the author in this case is not merely justly, but very liberally compensated. The publisher makes the book at a moderate price, because he makes more money by doing so.

Again: it is the publisher's obvious policy now, and it would continue to be, under an international law, to adapt his books to the market. If there is a call for fine editions as well as cheap ones, he will make those also. Another copyright-book may be mentioned—"Irving's Sketch Book." The publisher finds it expedient to make an edition of this at twenty dollars per copy; but he offers the buyer, at the same moment, other editions of the same book, at ten dollars, at two dollars, and at seventy-five cents. Each of these, observe, is a copyright-book, and the author's part is the same. These specimens illustrate a general principle.

Suppose an international law should cause a slight increase of price in order that the author may be compensated: will the reader grudge this?

But the payment by the publisher of five or ten per cent, or of a fixed sum, for the copyright of a book, whether by an American or a British author, under the proposed law, does not necessarily increase the price of a book. It is not so much a tax on the purchaser as it is a premium paid by the publisher for greater security to property in which he invests money for himself and his children.

This security, as Mr. Baldwin shows in his report, will inure to the benefit rather than the injury of all classes of readers, as well as of author and publisher.

II.

LORD MANSFIELD'S OPINION.

LETTER FROM ALBERT MATHEWS, ESQ.

NEW YORK, May 8th, 1868.

MY DEAR SIR:

Agreeably to your suggestion I will endeavor to help the good work you have in hand by copying out for your pamphlet some of the reasons of LORD MANSFIELD, on the subject of literary property, in the very celebrated case of Millar vs. Taylor (4 Burrows Rep. p. 2,396), decided in 1769. I have always thought that his masterly treatment of the subject should be the "text" of all writers who treat upon it. It is based on the immutable principles of justice and defies the tooth of time. The reasoning of this decision is very full and elaborate, and I think, to every lawyer at least, quite conclusive. I shall omit all the technical and most of the legal arguments in the epitome I present, as not within the scope of this communication, and confine my humble labors to a summary of the more general and abstract views. The case arose upon the claim of one Millar, a publisher, who had purchased of the author, Thomson, the copyright of the poem "The Seasons." After the expiration of the term limited by the statute of Anne, one Taylor published an edition of the poem without Millar's consent. Millar claimed a perpetual copyright in the poem, and brought this suit to recover damages.

Lord Mansfield said: "I use the word copy in the technical sense, to signify an incorporeal right to the sole printing and publishing of somewhat intellectual, communicated by letters." "No disposition, no transfer of paper upon which the composition is written, marked, or pressed (though it gives the power to print and publish), can be construed a conveyance of the copy without the author's express consent to 'print and publish,' much less against his will. The property of the copy thus narrowed, may equally go down from generation to generation, and possibly continue forever; though neither the author nor his representatives should have any manuscript whatsoever of the work, original, duplicate, or transcript."

"Mr. Gwynn was entitled undoubtedly to the paper of the transcript of Lord Clarendon's history, which gave him the power to print and publish. This might have been the only manuscript of it in being. Mr. Gwynn might have thrown it into the fire had he pleased. But at the distance of nearly a hundred years the copy was adjudged the property of Lord Clarendon's representatives."

"If the copy belongs to an author after publication, it certainly belonged to him before. All the metaphysical subtleties from the nature of the thing, may be equally objected to the property before. It is incorporeal; it relates to ideas detached from physical existence. There are indicia ; another may have the same thoughts upon the same subject, and expressed them in the same language verbatim. At what time and by what act does the property commence? The same string of questions may be asked upon the copy before publication."

"From what source, then, is the common law drawn, which is admitted to be clear in respect of the copy before publication?" "Because it is just that an author should reap the pecuniary profits of his own ingenuity and labor. It is just that another should not use his name without his consent. It is fit that he should judge when to publish or whether he will ever publish. It is fit he should not only choose the time but the manner of publication, how many, what volume, what print. It is fit he should choose to whose care he will trust the accuracy and correctness of the impression; to whose honesty he will confide not to foist in additions." These are "sufficient to show it is agreeable to the principles of right and wrong, the fitness of things, convenience and policy, to protect the copy before publication. But the same reasons hold after the author has published. He can reap no pecuniary profit if, the next moment after his work comes out, it may be pirated upon worse paper, and in worse print, and in a cheaper volume. The author may not only be deprived of any profit, but lose the expense he has been at. He is no more master of the use of his own name. He has no control over the correctness of his own work. He cannot prevent additions. He cannot retract errors. He cannot amend or cancel a faulty edition. Any one may print, pirate and perpetuate the imperfections, to the disgrace and against the will of the author; may propagate sentiments under his name which he disapproves, repents and is ashamed of. He can exercise no discretion as to the manner in which or the persons by whom his work shall be published." "All the objections, which hold as much to the kind of property before as to the kind of property after publication, go for nothing; they prove too much. There is no peculiar objection to the property after except 'that the copy is necessarily made common after the book is published.' Does a transfer of paper upon which it is printed necessarily transfer the copy more than the transfer of paper upon which it is written? The argument turns in a circle. 'The copy is made common because the law does not protect it; and the law cannot protect it because it is made common.' The author does not mean to make it common; and if the law says 'he ought to have the copy after publication,' it is a several property, easily protected, ascertained and secured. The whole then must finally resolve in this question, 'Whether it is agreeable to natural principles, moral justice and fitness, to allow him the copy after publication as well as before.' The general consent of this kingdom for ages is on the affirmative side. The legislative authority has taken it for granted, and interposed penalties to protect it for a time."

"The single opinion of such a man as Milton, speaking after much consideration upon the very point, is stronger than any inferences from gathering acorns and seizing a vacant piece of ground; when the writers, so far from thinking of the very point, speak of an imaginary state of nature before the invention of letters."

After numerous other illustrations and legal arguments, Lord Mansfield finally decides there is a legal property in authors, independent of the statute of Anne, or any thing done in conformity with it. Unfortunately for the welfare of mankind, this just doctrine was overturned in the House of Lords, in 1774, by the case of Donaldsons vs. Becketts. The vote was 22 to 11; the judges or "law lords" nearly all voting in the minority. This irreparable damage to the cause of learning and literature was chiefly owing to the sophistical declaration of Lord Camden; and the enemies of International Copyright from that time have done little but repeat his arguments. Their mischievous success is their chief title to respectful consideration.

Very respectfully, yours, &c.,

TO GEORGE P. PUTNAM.

ALBERT MATHEWS.

III.

THE COPYRIGHT QUESTION AS IT STANDS.

BY RICHARD GRANT WHITE.

Simply, of itself, could there be a clearer, plainer matter than this one of copyright? A man invents, after long effort and many failures, a kind of wheelbarrow, serviceable, handy, labor-saving. If you would honestly use the fruit of his time, his labor, and his inventive faculty, you must pay him his price. Another man, with much expenditure of time and money, in the culture of what faculty of thinking and thought-utterance he may have been born with, produces, after long brooding and sore travail, a book, which is not only his production, but his child—a part of himself—brought forth from himself—a something, to the making of which he has given not only the needful labor but the material. What substance and life there may be in it are not only his, but himself. If you use that book, not having paid him his price therefor, can you afterwards meet him, can you behold your own unnatural face in a glass without blushing? Is the laborer worthy of his hire, and the creator—he who is both laborer and that which is labored upon—unworthy? With him who denies, or hesitates about this right, it is necessary to begin at the beginning, and do one of two things—either civilize him up to the point at which he can apprehend a right to that which may be neither seen nor touched—a right incorporeal, or dispute with him upon the righteousness of the command, "Thou shalt not steal."

All this seems plain enough; but unfortunately for the wholesome conclusion to which it tends, an author's—a native author's—copyright rests neither in Great Britain nor in the United States upon this simple, solid ground. In equity it rests there; and so it does at common law. But since the passage of that accursed statute of Queen Anne, known in the reports as "8 Anne, cap. 19," the courts and the lawyers have assumed that an author's right in his copy exists in virtue of that Act, or of some one framed upon it, by which, for the gracious encouragement of learning, copyright—that is, a right in his copy, his book—was conferred upon and vested in the author. Now if this assumption is well grounded, if it be true that an author's right to say upon what terms people shall have copies of his books, is born of a statute, the British author has no ground of complaint that his books are printed and sold in the United States without profit to him, and without his consent, because in that case he has suffered no wrong. Both countries have the same English common law; but British statute law can confer no rights in the United States. It is a maxim of law that there is no wrong without a remedy. To turn this maxim round and say, "Here is no remedy, therefore there has been no wrong," might in some cases make the judges stare. But where a right exists in virtue of a statute, there is of necessity a remedy; and if copyright exists only in virtue of some statute, then what need of words to show that where copyright is set at naught and cannot be enforced, there has been no wrong? If the British author and the British publisher get all that the law gives, under which the one writes and the other publishes, and in virtue of which they claim payment, then they have all that is theirs. As to what goes on beyond the reach of an Act of Parliament, that is none of their business. If they receive any more money than comes to them lawfully in virtue of a right created by law, and which was one of the chief conditions upon which they undertook their risk, that more is sheer overplus—a windfall, gift of the gods, or whatever one may please to call some bounty that comes we know not exactly whence or why, but goes we know exactly whither. What is true in this respect of British authors and publishers, is, of course, equally true of their "American" brothers and rivals.

But what man of common sense and single eye does not see that the assumption of the lawyers is absurd, monstrous?—that an author's right in the use of his works is not statutory; that copyright is not created by Act of Parliament or Act of Congress? That statute of Queen Anne of blessed memory, created no right; it destroyed: it conferred nothing; it restricted: it did not give; it took away: for copyright is, as we have already seen, chiefly of all rights of property, a natural right, one that in the very nature of things pertains to the maker of the copy, the author. That a man's thoughts are his own cannot be disputed, and, like the plainest truths, it can hardly be proved. But they cannot be even possessed by or in the knowledge of another, except he communicates them. Does he lose his right of property in them by putting them upon paper? This is not a question of opinion; it is a question of fact. He puts his manuscript into his drawer, and there it is his exclusive possession, and in his exclusive knowledge—a thing quite out of reach of all other men, except in a country where it may be lawful and usual to break open a man's enclosure, and take his private papers, to your own or to the public benefit. Does he give up his right in it by allowing you to read it, or to make a copy for your own benefit? No; for however it may be with regard to the spontaneous fruits of nature; the products of human industry, which are the results of labor and contrivance, are owned by a right which must be respected, unless it has been expressly and openly renounced. The writer of a manuscript can fix the conditions upon which it may be used by other persons. Those conditions may be unwise and unkind; they cannot be unjust, for a man may do what he will with his own, and they cannot be disputed. He says to the public, "You wish to have the pleasure or the instruction to be derived from the reading of my book. Well, do you, through your Government, secure to me the receipt of a certain proportion of the money for which each copy may be sold, and I will print my book and publish it; otherwise, back goes my copy into my drawer, or here it goes into the fire!"

Circumstances, common sense, and an ordinary knowledge of the world, may be relied upon to procure for the public the reading of his book without the payment of an exorbitant price to the author: for, by insisting upon the latter, he would defeat his own interests. Without publication, the book is useless to him as a means of getting a return for his labor. This obvious condition of the case was well made by Mr. Justice Aston, of the King's Bench, an all-sufficient answer to the argument gravely put before that court—and which is still sometimes heard—that an author, by publication of his book, makes the copy common. In other words, the act necessary to making a book useful and profitable to its author is construed to be destructive of his property in the results of his labor! Surely such an argument is worthy only of men too uncivilized, or too dull-brained, to see that a man may sell the use of a thing without selling the thing itself; or part with a certain right in it without giving up all his rights; and that an author, in publishing and selling his book, sells to each buyer a certain use only of the book: He sells the paper, the print, and the binding absolutely, but the book conditionally—that is, he sells the volume, and the use of it, but not the copy. He does not, by publication, openly renounce his natural right in the fruits of his time, his thought, and his labor, without which open renunciation all such natural rights are presumed to be reserved and retained.* Now this right in his copy he can sell, or give, or bequeath. Unless he can do this with it, it is not his; he is not in its full possession; he has merely the usufruct of his work, a life interest, or an interest more or less limited. To say which, with regard to that which a man has not only produced by labor, but has made, as no man ever makes a ship or a house, or a bale of cotton, is absurd, and, more, is shameful. An author clearly has a natural right to sell all that he owns. This is no privilege, or peculiar right of his: he has it in common with all other men. He has, therefore, the natural right to sell, or to transfer for any consideration whatever, his absolute control over his copy. The person to whom it is transferred, having acquired all the author's rights, can transfer them to another, and he in his turn to another, and so forth, as long as there is any thing to be transferred. So it is with a house or a ship that a man has built; and why it should not be so with a book that he has made, no one can say, or at least has hitherto said, except upon grounds that invalidate the possession of all property. Then comes a time when the house and the ship deteriorate in value, and finally become so worthless, that there is nothing in them worth buying; and so it would be with the copyright of a book. But then there are some books that seem to be of immortal worth. Well; and then let him who owns them profit by them, as if he owned a noble, imperishable house. But this profit will not then go to the author. What if it do not? Did the Duke of Richmond build Belvoir Castle? The conclusion is that copyright, if it is not created and conferred by statute, is a natural, absolute, and perpetual right. That it existed, and in the nature of things must have existed, before the making of any law upon the subject, we have seen, I trust, with sufficient clearness. But let us see what the statute of Anne is, what it pretended to do, and what was the author's relation to his copy before the passing of that Act, and let us consider the last point first.

* "Barbeyrac, Notes on Puffendorf." Maugham, p. 10.

The common law of England recognized the natural, absolute, and perpetual right of the author in his copy; and this right was transferred by him, and bought and sold without limitation, until the Act of Queen Anne became British law upon this subject. Books were entered by their titles and their author's names upon the "Stationers' Register," as belonging to certain persons, and if these persons sold them to others, the transfer was made upon that register. The register and the transfer made the person recorded as the owner of the book its legal proprietor, with the sole right of printing it; and the duration of that right was without limitation, expressed or implied. The business of authors, and especially of stationers (as publishers and booksellers were then called) was conducted upon this recognized practice of the trade, this acknowledged right at common law. This custom was proved in the case of Millar v. Taylor, for the violation of the copyright of Thomson's "Seasons," which was tried in 1769, and in a special verdict, the jury found:

"That before the reign of her late Majesty Queen Anne, it was usual to purchase from authors the perpetual copyright of their books, and to assign them from hand to hand for valuable considerations, and to make the same the subject of family settlements for the provision of wives and children."*

So much for the notion that copyright is not a natural, but a statutory right, a right created by Act of Parliament, which has but recently been seriously put forth. Sir Thomas Clarke, Master of the Rolls, said in 1761, "It is not necessary to determine whether authors had a property in their works before the reign of Queen Anne. If they had not, it was a reproach to the law." But it is clear that they had this right. What the Queen Anne Act did was, under the pretence of the encouragement of learning, by securing copyright to authors and their representatives, and enabling them to enforce those rights—to restrict, diminish, and limit the rights of authors in their books, to lay burthens upon them, and even to control the prices which they should ask for the fruit of their own labors. The title of the Act is, "An Act for the Encouragement of Learning, by vesting the copies of Printed Books in the Authors, or purchasers of such copies during the times therein mentioned." Remembering that the copies were already vested in the authors by natural right, and at common law in perpetuity, and considering that the first section of this law assumed to confer upon the author of a book, or upon his representative, the sole right and liberty of printing such book "for the term of twenty-one years" in certain cases, and others, "for the term of fourteen years, and no longer," we see that this Act gave nothing in the way of copyright, and took away much. It gave something in making it easier for the author or the publisher to enforce his right, which from the loose and piratical practices of the trade was subject to depredation, against which it had long been difficult for him to protect himself. This liability to robbery was the only need for legislation upon the subject, as far as "the encouragement of learning" was concerned. Parliament might as well for the encouragement of building have passed an Act providing that every man who built a house should have an undisputed right to live in, rent, or sell it for fourteen years, and no longer. But, in addition to this curtailment and restriction of the author's property in his book by natural right and at common law, the Act required every bookseller to sell his books at a price not deemed "too high and unreasonable" by the Lord Arch-bishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, and ten other dignitaries of the realm, either one of whom could, upon complaint and after hearing, compel the bookseller to reduce his price to one that seemed just and reasonable to the dignity aforesaid, and to pay the costs of the proceeding. It also provided that nine copies, on the best paper, of every book published should be given by the author and the publisher to the libraries of certain Universities and Faculties, in default of which the copyright should fail, and the bookseller should be fined. All copyright laws in Great Britain and the United States are mere modifications of this beneficent and beautiful enactment of Queen Anne's day, which diminished the author's rights, and laid burthens upon him and his business partner, the publisher, for the encouragement of learning. One copy of each book only has been demanded hitherto in the United States—that deposited as the book, copyright of which is claimed. But some years ago Congress passed an Act requiring a copy to be given to its own library, in default of which the author loses his copyright: a most unrighteous act. Upon what pretence can Congress go to Mr. Longfellow, and say, give us a copy of each one of your books, or you shall have no property in all the other copies. But this is all in keeping. If Parliament and Congress give authors the right to the enjoyment of the fruit of their labours, then Parliament and Congress, of course, may make the conditions of their gift, or, be it remembered, they may refuse the gift altogether, and on any terms whatever; and if the author's right in his copy is merely statutory, then the British author has no grounds of complaint that his books are printed without profit to him in the United States, because there British statutes have no force, and there no rights can exist by Act of Parliament.

* Maugham, p. 16.

The remedy for all this confusion and wrong is a simple one. No legislation is needed—that is, none of a positive character; no act for the encouragement of learning, of which we have had quite enough. Let Parliament and Congress simply repeal in ten words all copyright laws, and the British author's right to his book in the United States, and the "American" author's to his in Great Britain, would be as absolute and defensible as Sir Edward Cunard's is in one of his steamers, whether it be in New York or Liverpool; and if it were deemed necessary to restrict the duration of copyright, although the necessity of the restriction is not easy to be discovered, to the few words of repeal there might be added a few others to the effect that for the benefit of the buyers of books, no author's right in his copy shall exist for a longer period than sixty years, or during his own life, and that of his heir or heirs-at-law living at the time of his death. Until this step or its equivalent is taken, and the author's right is recognized as one not created, but modified and restricted by statute law, British authors in the United States, and "American" authors in Great Britain, can have no standing, no claim based on right, but only an appeal in misericordiam to the compassion of the legislature of either country.—

From an article in "The Broadway," for May, 1868.

Copyright Association.

CONSTITUTION.

ADOPTED AT THE MEETING HELD MAY 4, 1868.

I. This association shall be called "The Copyright Association for the Protection and Advancement of Literature and Art."

II. Its officers shall be, a President, seven Vice-Presidents, two Recording Secretaries, Corresponding Secretary, Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of Seven.

III. The duties of the officers shall be to carry out the objects of the Association in their several departments.

IV. These objects are expressed in the title of the association. The primary and special object shall be to promote, by all legitimate means, the enactment of a just and suitable International Copyright Law, for the benefit of authors and artists in all parts of the world.

V. Meetings of the Association shall be held on the second Tuesday of each month, unless otherwise ordered.

VI. An election for officers of the Association shall be held at the October meeting of each year.

After the adoption of the above Constitution, the following ticket of officers was chosen, to serve until the meeting of October, 1868.

President :	W. C. BRYANT.
Vice-Presidents :	H. W. LONGFELLOW, of Mass., G. H. BOKER, of Penn., W. G. SIMMS, of S. C., F. LIEBER, G. W. CURTIS, H. GREELEY, F. A. P. BARNARD, } of N. Y.
Treasurer :	HENRY IVISON.
Recording Secretaries :	C. A. SPENCER, A. D. F. RANDOLPH.
Corresponding Secretary :	J. PARTON.
Executive Committee :	S. I. PRIME, S. S. COX, G. P. PUTNAM, C. SCRIBNER, E. G. SQUIER, E. C. STEDMAN, R. G. WHITE.

TO THE HONORABLE THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES.

We, the undersigned, concerned in the production, manufacture, and sale of Books, Periodicals, Designs, and Objects of Art, request the early attention of your honorable bodies to the subject of International Copyright. We respectfully solicit the passage of a Bill such as, in the judgment of Congress, may best secure the rights of Authors, Artists, and Designers to control and derive profit from the multiplication of copies of their works in countries other than their own.

And your memorialists, &c.

March, 1868.

AGASSIZ, LOUIS, Author: "Natural History," etc., Cambridge, Mass.
 ALDEN, WM. LIVINGSTON, Assoc. Editor: "Citizen," New York.
 ALGER, W. R. Author: "Future Life," etc., Boston, Mass.
 AMERICAN NEWS CO. New York.
 ATWATER, E. R. "Christian Intelligencer," New York.
 BABBITT BROS. Booksellers & Publishers, New York.
 BARNES & Co. A. S. Publishers, New York.
 BARRETT, JOS. H. Author: "Life of Lincoln," Cincinnati, Ohio.
 BASSETT, ALLEN L. Publisher: "Northern Monthly," New York.
 BATCHELDER, SAMUEL, JR. Author: "Young Men of America," Boston, Mass.
 BEACH, E. T. P. Author: "Story of Pelayo," New York.
 BEADLE & Co. Booksellers & Publishers, New York.
 BEARDSLEY, E. EDWARDS, Author: "Episcopal Church," New Haven.
 BEECHER, HENRY WARD, Author: "Sermons," "Norwood," etc., New York.
 BEERS, ETHEL LYNN, Author: "Poems," Yonkers, New York.
 BICKMORE, ALBERT S. Author, Cambridge, Mass.
 BLACKBURN, WM. M. Author: "Calvin," etc., Trenton, N. J.
 BOARDMAN, HENRY A. Author: "Bible in the Family," Philadelphia.
 BOGART, WM. H. Author: "Life of Boone," Albany, New York.
 BOKER, GEO. H. Author: "Poems," Philadelphia.
 BONNER, ROBERT, Publisher: "New York Ledger," New York.
 BOUNE, WM. OLAND, Editor: "Soldiers' Friend," New York.
 BOYNTON, CHAS. B. Author: "History of Navy," Washington, D. C.
 BRADY, FRED. A. Bookseller & Publisher, New York.
 BRIGGS, CHARLES F. Author & Journalist, New York.
 BRISTED, CHARLES ASTOR, Author: "English Universities," etc., New York.
 BRITTAN, S. B. Author: "Man in his Relations," New York.
 BROWN, HENRY T. Editor: "American Artisan," New York.
 BROWN, NATHAN, Editor: "American Baptist," New York.
 BRUNS, HENRY M. Author & Prof. of Literature, Charleston, S. C.
 BRYANT, WM. C. Author & Journalist, New York.

BULFINCH, S. G. Author: "Evidences Christianity," Cambridge, Mass.

CALDWELL, S. C. "Methodist," New York.

CALVERT, GEO. H. Author: "Gentleman," Newport, R. I.

COXE, A. CLEVELAND, Author: "Christian Ballads," "Sermons," Buffalo, N. Y.

DANA, WM. B. Editor: "Merchants Magazine," New York.

DARLEY, F. O. C. Artist, Claymont, Del.

DAVIS, ANDREW JACKSON, Author: "Principles of Nature," Orange, New Jersey.

DAVIS, THEO. R. Artist, New York.

DENNISON, CHARLES. W. Author, New York.

DENNISON, MARY A. Author, New York.

DERBY, J. C. Publisher, New York.

DEWEY, CHESTER P. Editor: "Commercial Advertiser," New York.

DICK & FITZGERALD, Booksellers & Publishers, New York.

DUGANNE, A. J. H. Author: "Hist. Government," Albany, N. Y.

DUYCKINCK, E. A. Author: "Cyclop. of Amer. Lit.," etc., New York.

EMERSON, RALPH WALDO, Author, Concord, Mass.

EVANS, AUGUSTA J. Author: "Beulah," etc., Mobile, Ala.

EVERETT WILLIAM, Author: "On the Cam," Cambridge, Mass.

FISH, HENRY C. Author: "Pulpit Eloquence," Newark, N. Y.

FRANCIS, SAMUEL W. Author: "Physicians of New York," Newport, R. I.

FRESE, JACOB R. Author: "Travels in Egypt," Trenton, N. J.

FREMONT, JESSIE BENTON, Author: "Story of the Guard," New York.

FREMONT, JOHN C. Author: "Explorations," New York.

FULLER, R. F. Author: "Chaplain Fuller," Boston, Mass.

GAGE, FRANCES D. Author, New York.

GARRISON, W. P. "The Nation," New York.

GOULD, E. S. Author: "Good English," New York.

GRAY, ASA, Author: "Botanical Works," Harvard College.

GREELEY, HORACE, Author: "American Conflict," etc., New York.

GREENE, GEO. W. Author: "American Revolution," etc., New York.

GRISCOM, JOHN H. Author: "Use and Abuse of Air," etc., New York.

GROSS, S. G. Author: "Surgery," etc., Philadelphia.

GULICK, DAVID B. Engraver, New York.

HALL, JOHN, Editor: "Alexander's Correspondence," Trenton, N. J.

HALPINE, CHARLES G. Author: "Miles O'Reilly," etc., New York.

HAMMOND, WM. A. Author: "Medical Works," New York.

HERTZBERG, CONSTANTINE, Artist, Brooklyn.

HIGGINSON, THOS. WENTWORTH, Author: "Out-Door Papers," Newport, R. I.

HOLMES, MARIA J. Author: "Tempest & Sunshine," Brockport, N. Y.
 HOLMES, OLIVER WENDELL, Author: "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table," etc., Boston.

HOPKINS, J. H. JR. Editor: "Church Journal," New York.

HOVEY, ALVAH, Author: Theol. Works, Newton, Mass.

HUNTINGTON, D. Prest. Natl. Acad. of Design, N. Y.

JERVEY, CAROLINE H. Author: "Vernon Grove," Charleston, S. C.

JOHONNOT, JAS. Author: "School Architecture," New York.

KEMBLE, FRANCES ANNE, Author: "Poems," etc., Germantown, Pa.

KING, DAVID, Newport, R. I.

LELAND, CHARLES GODFREY, Author: "Sunshine & Thought," etc., Philadelphia.

LEWIS, DIO, Author: "Physical Education," Boston, Mass.

LEYPOLDT & HOLT, Publishers, New York.

LIEBER, FRANCIS, Author: "Civil Liberty," etc., New York.

LIPPINCOTT, SARAH J. "Grace Greenwood," Author, Philadelphia, Pa.

LONGFELLOW, HENRY W. Author, Cambridge, Mass.

LOWELL, J. RUSSELL, Editor & Author: "North Amer. Review," Harvard College.

MATTHEWS, ALBERT, Author, New York.

MEDBERRY, JAMES K. Supt.: "Amer. Lit. Bureau," New York.

MILES, J. W. Author & Prof. of Classical Literature, Charleston, S. C.

MILLER, WOOD & Co. Booksellers & Publishers, New York.

MORRIS, WM. H. Author: "Infantry Tactics," New York.

MUZZEY, ARTEMAS B. Author, Cambridge, Mass.

NAST, THOMAS, Artist, New York.

OLMSTED, FRED. LAW, Author: "Slave States," etc., New York.

ORR, NATH'L. Engraver, New York.

PALFREY, JOHN G. Author: "History of New England," Boston, Mass.

PALMER, J. W. Author: "Up and down the Irawaddy," New York.

PARKMAN, FRANCIS, Author: "Jesuits in North America," Boston, Mass.

PARSONS, THEOPHILUS, Dane Prof. Law, Harvard—author of "Law of Contracts," etc.

PARTON, JAMES, Author: "Famous Americans," etc., New York.

PARTON, MRS. JAMES, Author: "Fanny Fern," etc., New York.

PAULDING, W. J. Author: "Life of Paulding," etc., Cold Spring, N. Y.

PEABODY, A. P. Author: "Religion of Nature," Boston, Mass.

PERKINS, FRED. B. Journalist & Author, New York.

PERRY, GEORGE, Editor: "Home Journal," New York.

PHILES & Co., GEO. P. Booksellers & Publishers, New York.

PHILLIPS, MORRIS, Editor: "Home Journal," New York.

- PORTER & COATES, Publishers, Philadelphia.
 PORTER, NOAH, Author & Editor: "Webster's Dictionary," Yale College.
 POWELL, A. M. "Anti Slavery Standard," New York.
 PRIME, S. IRENÆUS, Author & Editor: "New York Observer," New York.
 PUTNAM & SON, G. P. Publishers, New York.
 RANDOLPH, A. D. F. Publisher, New York.
 ROE, A. S. Author: "I've been Thinking," etc., East Windsor Hill, Conn.
 ROOSEVELT, ROBERT B. Author: "Superior Fishing," etc., N. Y.
 ROSSITER, T. P. Artist, Cold Spring, N. Y.
 RUSCHENBERGER, W. S. W. Author: "Voyage Round the World," etc., Phila.
 SAXE, JOHN G. Author: "Poems," Albany, N. Y.
 SCRIBNER & Co., CHARLES, Booksellers & Publishers, New York.
 SHEDD, WM. G. T. Author: "Philosophy of History," etc., New York.
 SILLIMAN, BENJ. Author: "Chemistry," etc., Yale College.
 SIMMS, WM. GILMORE, Novelist, Charleston, S. C.
 SPENCER, CHARLES AMES, Author, New York.
 SPENCER, J. A. Author: "History of United States," etc., New York.
 SPRAGUE, WM. B. Author: "American Pulpit," Albany, N. Y.
 SQUIER, E. GEO. Author: "Nicaragua," New York.
 STEDMAN, EDMUND C. Author & Journalist, New York.
 STODDARD, R. H. Author, Journalist, New York.
 STREET, ALFRED B. Author: "Poems," etc., Albany, N. Y.
 THOMPSON, JOSEPH P. Author: "Egypt," "Christian Graces," etc., New York.
 TICKNOR & FIELDS, Publishers, Boston & New York.
 TOMES, ROBERT, Author: "Champagne Country," etc., New York.
 TOMLINSON, W. P. Author: "Kansas," New York.
 TORREY, JAMES D. Bookseller & Publisher, New York.
 TUCKERMAN, HENRY T. Author: "Criterion, Artist Life," etc., New York.
 TUTHILL, LOUISA C. Author: "History of Architecture," etc., Princeton, N. Y.
 VAN WYCK, CHARLES, "Christian Intelligencer," New York.
 VAUX, CALVERT, Author: "Villas & Cottages," etc., New York.
 VICTOR, METTA VICTORIA, Novelist, New York.
 VICTOR, ORVILLE J. Historian, New York.
 WALKER, JOHN R. Assoc. Editor: "Citizen," New York.
 WALLING, H. F. Author & Prof. "LaFayette College," Easton, Pa.
 WARING, GEO. E. Author: "Agriculture," Newport, R. I.
 WAUD, ALFRED R. Artist, New York.
 WAUD, WM. Artist, New York.
 WEED, THURLOW, Editor: "Commercial Advertiser," New York.

WELLS, SAMUEL R. Editor: "Phrenological Journal," New York.

WHITE, GEO. G. Artist, New York.

WRIGHT, JOS. J. Author: "Tales of the War," Boston, Mass.

WILLISTON, H. C. "Commercial Advertiser," New York.

WITHERS, FRED C. Author: "Church Architecture," New York.

WYMAN, JEFFRIES, Author: Scientific Works, Harvard College.

YATES, M. G. "Commercial Advertiser, New York.

YOUNG, WILLIAM, Journalist, New York.

AND MANY OTHERS.

